

How the COVID19 Pandemic is Impacting Recreational Land Sales

Even during the pandemic, we've seen interest from potential buyers remain steady, though sales could slow if the impacts of the pandemic persist for a long period. At the same time, we currently expect the potential for sales to rebound in the summer and fall, depending of course on when the nation's economy is able to open back up.

Selling recreational land during the COVID-19 pandemic has certainly been challenging, but sales are continuing to occur around the country. So what are we seeing in the marketplace this spring?

Even during the pandemic, we've seen interest from potential buyers remain steady, though sales could slow if the impacts of the pandemic persist for a long period. At the same time, we currently expect the potential for sales to rebound in the summer and fall, depending of course on when the nation's economy is able to open back up.
